COMPETITION NEWS

This is the official Press Release, which was sent out by the Heine Associates, P.A., the law firm representing YPCNJ in regards to the Incidences Occurring on June 12, 2005, at a Public Performance By Prize Winners of the Young Pianist Competition of New Jersey. Winners' Recital at Weill Recital Hall at Carnegie Recital Hall.

This law firm was engaged by Young Pianist Competition of New Jersey, Yelena Ivanov and Lana Ivanov to represent them in all legal matters arising out of certain events occurring on June 12, 2005, at a public performance it sponsored at Weill Recital Hall at New York's Carnegie Hall. Based upon extensive interviews with principals and disinterested witnesses, the following information has been confirmed.

The Young Pianist Competition of New Jersey was formed in 1989. Since that date, it has conducted a competition for young artists (generally through high school age) who live in the Tri-State area. The Competition's Artistic Director is Yelena Ivanov, an accomplished piano pedagogue. Following her extensive study in Moscow, she and her husband moved to the United States where she established a fine reputation as a teacher of young pianists. The participation of the contestants in this annual competition is usually facilitated by their individual private piano teachers.

Through the years, the Competition has grown to witness the participation of approximately 120 students annually. Each year, the Competition's disinterested jurists identify those contestants, reflective of age and experience, whose competition performances have excelled. The successful competitors participate in the Competition's culmination— the presentation of a recital at Weill Recital Hall. In 2005, 35 students participated in the winners' recital.

In the course of the competition, students may play personally selected repertoire that meets the competition's criteria. Following tradition and in the year 2005, after the winning recital participants were named, the competition's Director specified the piece each competitor would perform during the recital. It has been a consistent, understood, announced and observed practice for the Director to have full discretion and authority to specify the recital performance piece for each competitor. This practice not only assures balanced programming but also achieves the serious and limited time constraints in the Carnegie Hall engagement. This year, the entire performance was contractually limited to two hours. Accordingly, the piece selected for each participant was carefully designed to confine the total program, as well as ancillary program activities, to the allotted time.

Competitor Bryan O'Lone was provided with an information sheet that clearly identified the exact piece that he was authorized to play in the performance; namely, Beethoven's Pathétique, 3rd Movement, a 4½-minute piece. On the day of the winners' recital, Bryan O'Lone arrived with his parents and, before the public was admitted to the Hall, he was permitted to warm-up on the performance piano. Bryan was heard performing a Chopin piece, Scherzo No. 2, opus 31, which is a 12-minute piece. As soon as it was realized, Ms. Ivanov approached Bryan and informed him that that the longer Chopin piece was not the one approved for his performance, and that he was required to perform the shorter Beethoven selection. He then was taken to a private room with a practice piano so that he could warm up on the Beethoven piece, which was also in his active repertoire at the time.

At the scheduled time in the program, Bryan O'Lone entered the stage. Witnesses recollect that immediately prior to his performance, he announced to the audience of approximately 250, the following:

"There was a misprint in the program. I will play Chopin instead of Beethoven. Those who know this piece will enjoy it. Too bad for those who don't.."

Witnesses also confirm that he then commenced performing the 12-minute Chopin piece. Standing in the wings, Mrs. Ivanov overheard his performance of the unauthorized music. Mindful of the serious regulations, the integrity of the programming, the equality of treatment of all participants, and Bryan's disregard of clear instructions, she approached his piano while he was performing and instructed him to stop playing. He continued to play. With her left hand, she grasped firmly the keyboard cover and slowly moved it downwards to no more than 25% of it closing distance. Her grasp of the keyboard cover was firm and tightly controlled. The cover did not touch the hands of Bryan O'Lone.

Recognizing, that while his hands were free, he did not have full keyboard access, Bryan O'Lone removed his hands from the keyboard and placed them on his lap. Mrs. Ivanov then closed the piano cover and left the stage. As soon as she departed the stage, Bryan O'Lone lifted the cover from the keys and defiantly played the 12-minute Chopin piece from the beginning to its conclusion.

Immediately following the recital, false statements regarding the occurrences were circulated by Mr. O'Lone's family to the media. Some of the media quotations included descriptions that the keyboard lid of the piano was lowered on the pianist's fingers in a brutal assault. The clear recollection of disinterested witnesses sitting within feet of the piano performed upon by Mr. O'Lone and in full view of the keyboard, confirms that the handling of the keyboard lid of Mrs. Ivanov was controlled at all times, and the lid did not contact Bryan's fingers.

Further claims of O'Lone and his parents have been contained in a lawsuit filed in the Superior Court of New Jersey on or about July 1, 2005. Our investigation reveals that the claims made in the suit are a gross misrepresentation of the actual facts and have irresponsibly damaged the Competition and its Directors.

The non-profit corporation and its principals will take all necessary steps to defend the defamation and to restore to the Competition the lustre that was dulled by plaintiffs' defiant conduct. The recital was by necessity and tradition governed by strict rules. The adherence to recital rules by all participants assures that achievement is acknowledged in an environment that fosters integrity, fairness, accuracy and evenhandedness.

Young Mr. O'Lone, with or without parental blessing, was not privileged to make his own rules. Ms. Ivanov's conduct was necessary, measured, lawful and direct. Bryan O'Lone's sole injury was to his unrestrained ego.

Webmaster destroys/moves YPCNJ website over personal differences with Yelena Ivanov. Around the beginning of August we were shocked to discover that YPCNJ website stopped functioning, the usual address now pointed to a shopping site. We received hundreds of calls from students, teachers and concerned parents asking about the site. This happened during the media blitz related to the O'Lone affair. Needless to say it was the worst possible time to be without website. These events closely coincided with the resignation of Mrs. Sharon Wei - our Webmaster.

YPCNJ was always very grateful to its dedicated volunteer Webmaster Mrs. Wei. Mrs. Wei designed and maintained our site since its beginning in 2002. Quickly the site became a vital part of YPCNJ by facilitating most of communications, public announcements, application forms etc. It was our public face.

As many may know Mrs. Wei is also a mother of Kevin Jang, a talented and accomplished young pianist who until this August studied and flourished under Yelena Ivanov. During the last summer Festival "Musica in Laguna" in Italy, Yelena Ivanov informed Mrs. Wei that she could not continue to teach Kevin. Teachers and students parting ways are common, after all only few students study under the same teacher throughout their education.

We believe that Mrs. Wei acted out her bitterness against Yelena Ivanov and destroyed / moved the site deliberately. Somehow she forgot that the site was not hers to destroy or move. What she has done is the equivalent of breaking into a Salvation Army store to take back her donations. This was a hostile and irrational act against the teacher who greatly contributed to Kevin's growth and success. We do not want to comment at this time on either the ethics or legality of her actions.

We are using this opportunity to thank SimX Corporation for donating their services and bringing the Site back to life.
